First, the aim is to examine patient and clinician factors that are associated with the transition to pediatric psychiatry within the context of pediatric general medicine. Second, the aim is to determine whether the transition to pediatric psychiatry has positive outcomes for children and their families. And, third, the aim is to develop and test an intervention designed to help the transition to pediatric psychiatry. The significance of this research is twofold: The first aim will examine the transition to pediatric psychiatry in a general medical setting. The second aim will determine if there is a need to determine whether the transition to pediatric psychiatry results in children who are more likely to pursue a career in pediatrics and less likely to pursue a career in psychiatry. The third aim will examine an intervention that specifically addresses the transition to pediatric psychiatry within the context of general medical settings. It is well established that most children who present to primary care for mental health problems are diagnosed and treated in adult medicine, despite the fact that many are psychiatric disturbances and/or disorders that are defined as pediatric conditions. The study will examine whether this is a result of the lack of integrated care in which treatment and diagnosis occur in the same clinical setting, or due to a failure of primary care clinicians to recognize and prioritize the conditions that constitute the bulk of mental health problems in children and adolescents. The study will examine whether this is a result of the lack of integrated care in which treatment and diagnosis occur in the same clinical setting, or due to a failure of primary care clinicians to recognize and prioritize the conditions that constitute the bulk of mental health problems in children and adolescents. The study will also examine whether children who present for psychiatric care have the same outcomes as children who present for general medical care (i.e., whether they are
