Category:Windows-only softwareNorth Stradbroke Island red foxes cede their territory, but retain their foothold. Seasons of food scarcity and small population size make territoriality an important part of life history. In mammals, permanent residents typically spend a greater proportion of their time foraging in the wider home range, while short-term visitors are often considered less territorial. Here we examine whether the territoriality of red foxes on the most northerly Australian island (North Stradbroke Island) varies according to diel changes in food availability. Using traditional methods of camera trapping and monitoring, we recorded 22 sites within four foraging areas, two for dusk/night, and two for dawn/night. Mean occupancy was 3.6+/-0.07 foxes per site (N=1541 nights), and mean overlap was 0.83+/-0.04 nights (N=198). Inter-patch occupancy rates and overlap were similar for both night and day, indicating that foxes on North Stradbroke Island have a similar population density as elsewhere in Australia, but vary their use of the island territories. However, foxes in high food and low population density areas were less territorial during the night than during the day. Overlap was less than expected when food was available and greater than expected when food was scarce. Our results suggest that in the face of food shortage, red foxes are territorial, but change their use of their home ranges 09e8f5149f
