This invention relates to an apparatus and method for the high temperature treatment of metallic work pieces and more particularly to the vapor phase sintering of such work pieces. The vapor phase sintering of metallic work pieces under high temperature conditions has achieved considerable recognition as a means for transforming metal work pieces from bulk to submicronic dimensions. The advantages afforded by sintering in many applications over other conventional means of obtaining such small dimensions such as rolling and forging are well known, including lower pressure, time and energy requirements, production of a microstructure, much higher density and uniformity than is obtained by other means, precise dimensional control, and near net shape and fully dense shapes and articles. Presently known vapor phase sintering techniques, however, are difficult to implement because of the extreme temperature and pressure conditions required to produce the high temperature necessary to enable the densification of the work piece. These conditions are thus required to be maintained for a relatively long time period. Furthermore, since the work piece is in a moving gas stream at high temperature and pressure conditions, stringent requirements have been imposed on the physical structure of the furnace vessel in order to withstand the extreme temperatures required to support the work piece in that environment. In many instances, it is not feasible to use conventional furnaces for the vapor phase sintering of metal work pieces as suggested above due to problems associated with the risk of injury to the operator and the potential for adverse chemical reactions or contamination of the ambient environment. For example, in the sintering of several boron-containing metals, the temperature in the vapor phase sintering process must be maintained above 1400.degree. C. and the time required to reach this temperature is extremely long. It has been found, however, that a conventional furnace filled with flowing gas will burn up in a few seconds if ignited in close proximity to the furnace. There is also the risk of injury to an operator at the furnace, particularly in the event of a meltdown or explosion of the furnace. For example, the burner igniting in close proximity to the furnace could be in the melting zone of the furnace, whereby the ignition causes the entire melting zone to burn up, with immediate loss of a large volume of molten material. Furthermore, there is an explosion potential associated with the hazards of handling molten metal and a subsequent release of hot gas. The present invention overcomes these disadvantages by providing a new furnace technology that substantially reduces the risks of injury to operators, prevents an explosion hazard and is sufficiently safe to

Q: get system temp without using proc/sys I just realized that there are utilities out there to test the temperature of your CPU - on Linux of course. That's the sort of thing I'm after. I only need it for C++ programs, if you want it for C or other languages you're on your own. Everything I've found requires you to either be root or use the /proc/sys system files. Of course you can override the system temp with tools, but that's not really the point. I want to have a core temp available to my executable without having to rely on /proc to give it to me. A: Use pythons subprocess module. Install python-dev on linux systems and use either of the following methods. ./perf.py -i CPU -o cpu.html or perf --cpu-list=ALL -o cpu.html 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an electrical connector with a clip and, more particularly, to an electrical connector with a clip that may be designed to accommodate different sizes of auxiliary power supply cables. 2. Description of the Related Art An electrical connector is used to electrically connect a power supply cable to an electronic product. Typically, the electrical connector includes two shell halves that are assembled together to define a space in which an auxiliary power supply cable is to be received. For auxiliary power supply cables that are too small for the shell halves to accommodate, an electrical connector with a clip is used to fasten the electrical connector to an electronic product. U.S. Pat. No. 8,083,588 issued to Zhu, on Feb. 27, 2012, discloses a type of electrical connector that includes two shell halves. Each shell half defines a positioning slit that accommodates the end of an auxiliary power supply cable therein. The width of the positioning slit is smaller than the thickness of the cable. The strength of the auxiliary power supply cable is not taken into consideration when the design of the electrical connector, and may result in unreliable electrical connection between the auxiliary power supply cable and the electrical connector. Therefore, a new electrical connector is required to overcome the shortcoming.Surveillance for African swine fever virus in wild boar in Poland.
