"I have always maintained that these privileges and immunities were not constitutional rights but that they were statutory in nature. The 1950 Act [Immigration and Nationality Act] was passed by Congress and it was retroactive because Congress decided that aliens, not just any aliens but aliens who had sought the privileges of U.S. citizenship and aliens who had gained that citizenship through naturalization were in fact law-abiding citizens of the United States. Anybody who had previously violated the law or had some prior criminal history would not be automatically eligible to receive the statutory privileges and immunities. That was the legislation passed by Congress." Of course, that's not what the statute says. The law's language doesn't contemplate automatic citizenship — those who gained citizenship via naturalization or their parents had to swear an oath of citizenship. The rule, on the other hand, does. We've known about the rule's existence for some time. In a 2013 report titled "Alien Status in American Life," the Library of Congress provides a detailed account of the rule as it stands today, going back to 1917. "During the first 60 years of the Nationality Act," it says, "the 'unlawful immigrant' designation included a wide variety of different categories of people who had entered the United States prior to 1922 by one or more of the methods described above." But it could be argued that the rule is less a matter of law than of the executive branch's discretion. The Department of Justice (and, for that matter, USCIS) could always overturn a citizenship forfeiture, but that has not happened in the nearly 100 years the rule has been in place. There are three main objections to the creation of these supposedly blanket grants of citizenship. First, many people have a problem with the administration and administration of any system of automatic citizenship. Second, the lack of compensation for individuals given citizenship results in fewer enforcement actions against employers. And third, the creation of an automatic grant of citizenship has the potential to wreak havoc on the national immigration system. We've already discussed the first issue. The second is more immediate: Under the rule, individuals receive citizenship immediately. This means that the Department of Homeland Security, responsible for immigration enforcement, does not pursue criminals (at least those who did not apply for and receive a petition for naturalization). As a result, it's been claimed

Q: How to add only the image/file to thread? I have a div that has a file input. I can attach the file through a form. After the form submit, the user can enter specific information to the thread. This information is added to a db table. I am trying to add the picture to the thread before the users inputs the information. My problem is that the picture is added as a blob which means that my code can't recognize the picture. This is the code: foreach ($item as $i => $l) { $this->thread[$i]['user_id'] = $l['user_id']; $this->thread[$i]['cover_type_id'] = $l['cover_type_id']; $this->thread[$i]['topic_id'] = $l['topic_id']; $this->thread[$i]['posting_date'] = $l['posting_date']; $this->thread[$i]['title'] = $l['title']; $this->thread[$i]['image'] = $l['image']; $this->thread[$i]['message'] = $l['message']; $this->thread[$i]['user_name'] = $l['name']; $this->thread[$i]['photo_file'] = $l['photo_file']; $this->thread[$i]['photo_link'] = $l['photo_link']; $this->thread[$i]['photo_title'] = $l['photo_title']; $this->thread[$i]['date_posted']
