Dutch police told local media that they fined a Moroccan man some six times the amount of money he stole for failing to comply with the EU's night-curfew rules. The man, who lives in the Dutch city of Rotterdam and was not named, was nabbed by police for stealing a leather bag in a downtown Utrecht bar on December 29, Dutch news website Tweakers.nl reported. "The first tip-off came from a hotel employee, who found the bag on the first floor of the hotel," the report said. The bag held €9,000 and the man, who was taken into custody, claimed that he found it on a street. He explained that he had taken the bag from a friend's car to hide it from thieves, but didn't realize how much was inside until he checked it. The man was then subjected to a robbery investigation by police before the discovery that he had stolen the bag in Utrecht. Despite the fact that the theft occurred in a foreign country, Dutch law enfor

Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a fluidic switch with a micro-tube. 2. Description of the Related Art Cuiying Wang et al., a University of Michigan researcher, has attempted to develop a microfluidic switch that uses a volume change of the fluid during the operation and is capable of resisting environmental changes. In "Fluidic Switch Based on Volume Change of Working Fluid", published in the Journal of Micromechanics & Microengineering, February, 2005, volume 15, pages 270-277, a mechanical microfluidic switch in which an isolated chamber is formed on a single silicon substrate and switches the flow path of two flows by applying an external force such as a vacuum to the chamber. In the microfluidic switch in the above-described related art, however, fluid paths 0cc13bf012
