North Shore Telephone Company in New York City had no wiring designed by someone other than the telecommunications engineers. This turned out to be a major mistake..Energy companies say the long-overdue phase one of the National Broadband Network will hit home and become a reality in 2016, with more than 12,000 homes and businesses already connected, the co-founder of the Howard government's broadband network says. Malcolm Turnbull told IT media executives on the first day of his 10-day tour of Asia that the rollout of the network would be "unashamedly slow", and that national political stability was paramount to the completion of the project. "Although the target date has been some time off, we will be able to say in the new year that the phase one of the NBN will be in operation and that's a signal of national political stability and governmental stability," Mr Turnbull said. "It's important to know that the rollout is the culmination of many years of discussion and many changes in governments, but we've got to get through those issues before we get to the roll out of the NBN." Instead of rushing to complete the work that should have begun in 2008, political uncertainty has meant that the project became mired in a series of false starts and cost overruns. Mr Turnbull said the project's problems were due to a political history that has "largely forgotten" about the project, and the NBN is now "legally and politically very, very stable". "This government is keen to get on with it and get it right. That's the approach of this government," he said. "That's the approach of the Coalition because we're not going to do things by just trying to get them done quickly." Mr Turnbull also used his speech to present a case for rolling out the nation's broadband infrastructure.

"Let's be honest about the status of broadband in Australia: it's patchy and expensive and the good news is that it's going to be a lot better," he said. "We are currently investing nearly $14 billion in our telecommunications sector, which is roughly equal
