More particularly, the present invention is directed to an undercarriage for an absorbent pad system configured to transport waste liquid such as blood from a body cavity of a patient. Blood absorbing devices are well known. A blood absorbing device used for absorbing blood from a body cavity generally comprises a housing and an absorbent pad which is housed within the housing. The absorbent pad is designed to be placed on a portion of the body of a patient, such as a skin surface. The absorbent pad is designed to receive blood from the patient. As the absorbent pad receives blood, the absorbent pad progressively absorbs the received blood thereby becoming saturated. After reaching saturation, the absorbent pad is designed to transport the blood in the absorbent pad to the housing. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 5,057,069 (the '069 patent) shows an undercarriage for an absorbent pad system which includes a housing, a first absorbent pad and a second absorbent pad. The first absorbent pad is housed within the housing and the second absorbent pad is positioned outside the housing. The first and second absorbent pads are attached to a top surface of the housing. The '069 patent also shows that the absorbent pads must be supported upon the housing to prevent movement of the absorbent pads relative to the housing. The '069 patent further shows that the first absorbent pad may be provided with a series of vertically extending protuberances upon an inner surface of the first absorbent pad which are designed to resiliently engage the housing so as to hold the first absorbent pad in an upright position. The first absorbent pad is held in place within the housing by a series of laterally extending end portions. The series of laterally extending end portions each includes a laterally extending end portion having a generally inverted U
